SPRING KALLAH 2012

Israeli artist's scream heard round the world

Noam Galai, an Israeli photographer, has launched to international acclaim, even in Iran, one of Israel's most noted enemies. Noam Galai is primarily a sports photographer for the NBA, and his work includes shooting at the NBA All-Star game in Dallas a few years ago.

"I'm not sure what gave me the inspiration," Galai said in our interview. "As a kid, I used to do a lot of art, mainly drawing and painting. I also liked taking pictures with a very simple camera (plastic point and shoot film camera), mostly on holidays and trips, mostly just to document it for myself and have some memories from those events. I started taking it seriously around age 16 to 17, and started shooting professionally when I was 20, while in the army."

What launched Galai to fame came from a photo Galai took of himself mid-scream. Galai posted his photo to a social networking site, but Galai did not foresee the immense popularity of his photo. It began when South American art books asked his permission to put the photo in their publications.

Later, other publishing companies started publishing copies of the photo without proper rights. People then took much of the negative space and replaced it their own unique additions. Eventually, the scream reached the streets of Iran. As Iranian discontent, and more recently the Egyptian uprisings, prompted graffiti and other art, they used Galai's scream to express their own desire to break away from their oppression.

"It was weird to see that my face is being used in places like this, but it was also very cool. They chose my face because it worked well for what they wanted to express - the fact that I am Israeli should not change that fact, and I am sure the people who used it never knew that this face belongs to an Israeli guy," Galai commented. Now Galai's portfolio is managed and protected by copyright laws so nobody can use it illegally. The black and white photo can be found online, though, if simply typed into a search engine.

The rate of Jewish intermarriage is a serious problem. Scientists estimate that unless something can be done to stop intermarriage, in 100 years, the Jewish people will be reduced to a race of gorgeous blondes.

"It is easy to tell the difference between Jews and Gentiles. After the show, all the gentiles are saying 'Have a drink? Want a drink? Let's have a drink!' While all the Jews are saying 'Have you eaten yet? Want a piece of cake? Let's have some cake!'" - Jackie Mason

“A lot of people are getting into religious fiction these days, reading things like the Da Vinci Code and the Bible.. I know, I know, the Da Vinci Code might be real. So, I’m Jewish, but I’m not uber-Jewish. Like I will use German to describe my Jewishness.” —Myq Kaplan

“My sister is getting married, and she and her fiancé are taking each other’s last names. So she’ll be Susan Silverman-Abramowitz. Or, ya know, Jews.” — Sarah Silverman
